

This is Capo Sile, across the Piave, near Venice, where the Italians have established an important bridgehead in their counter offensive.

Photo, Press Illustrating Service.

Italian troops being hurried to the reserve positions in the rear of the front lines, in anticipation of the Austrian drive. This scene is on the northern hinge of the front in the mountains.

Photo, Press Illustrating Service.

American marines, on the way to the front, seek shelter in an old mill half way between the first and the second line trenches.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information.

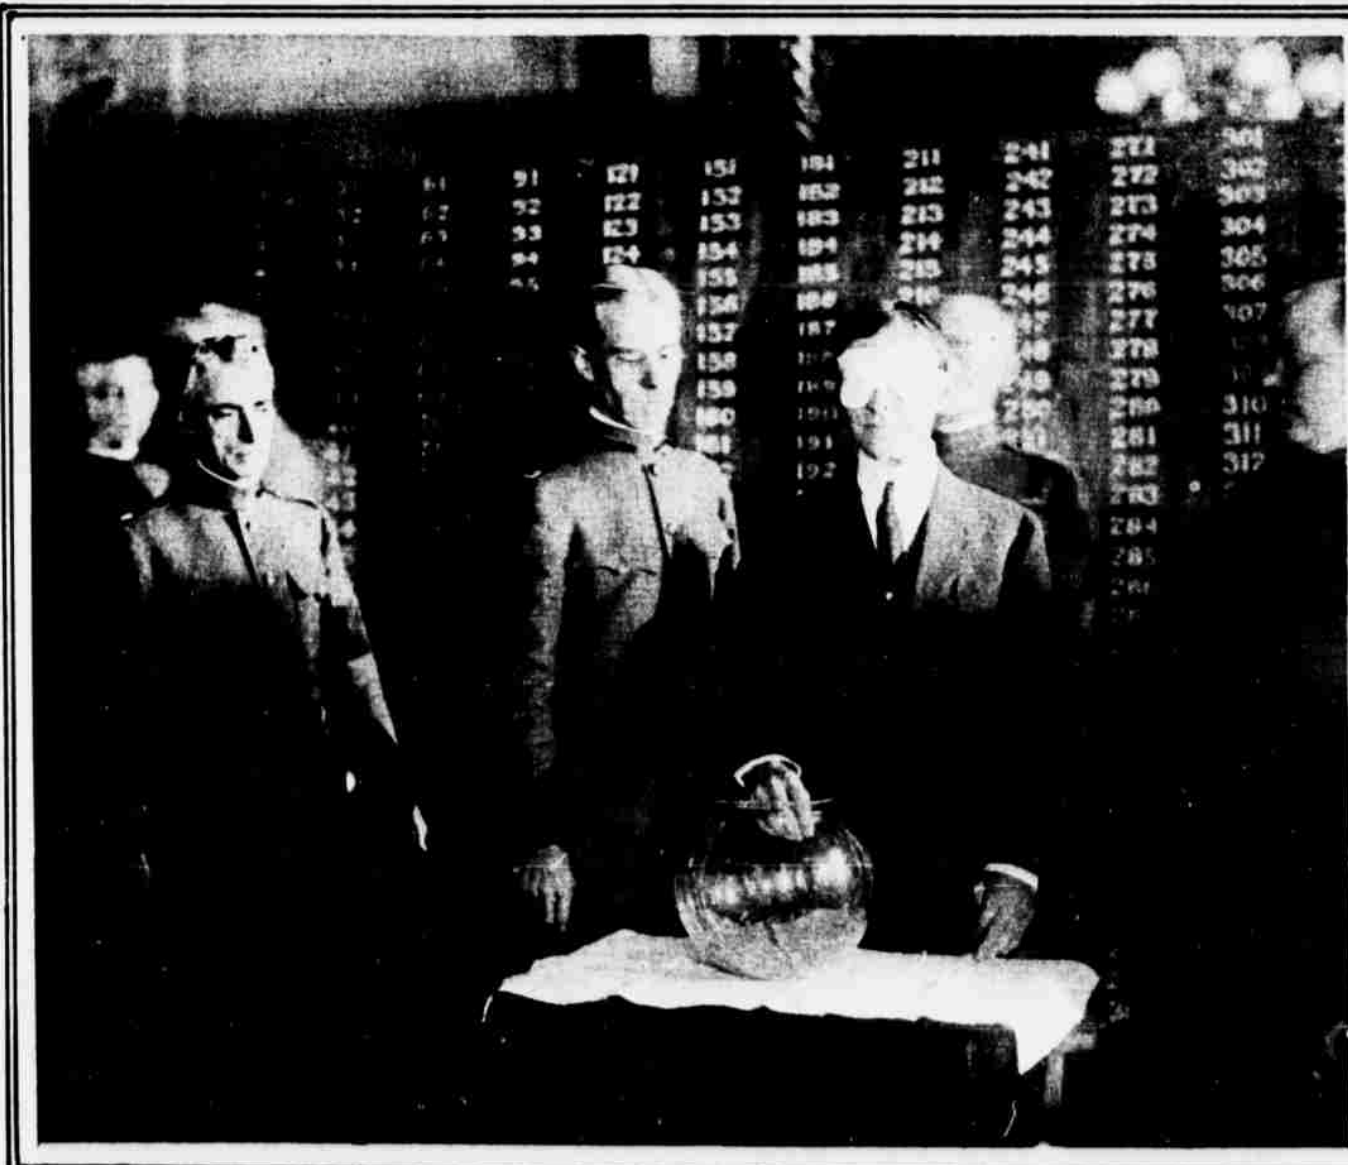

First picture of Austrians taken prisoner by Italian troops in the recent drive. The Teutons thought it was going to be easy, but they ran against a stone wall.

Photo, International Film Service.

Above—"Major Billy" Welborn, an employee in the war office at Washington, holding the bowl containing the capsules that determined the order in which they should be called for service under the selective draft act on June 5. At Right—Secretary of War Baker, blindfolded, drawing the capsule encasing the first number, which turned out to be 246.

Copyright, 1918, Committee on Public Information

The historic cathedral of Soissons. The photograph was taken a few days before the French evacuated the city in the German drive to the Marne. There wasn't much left of the edifice then. Probably there is less now.

Copyright, Press Illustrating Service.